- Government documents have historically been an underused resource. We believe that this affects the quality of library service as a whole, as users miss out on a wealth of primary, unbiased, and trustworthy information. It is our belief that these resources will get more use if potential users are made aware of their existence. We have developed a pilot project to test this theory by including an introduction to Government Documents in Library Orientation sessions. This session will include such topics as: How we prepared for the sessions; tools that were utilized; how we conducted sessions; student (and professor) reactions and feedback; what we did right; what we will do differently next time.*
