Early American Newspapers

Series 20: America's Industrial Centers and the Politics of Race, Gender, and Immigration

During the 19th century, the rapid growth of industry in America's mid-Atlantic and Midwestern states led to continued newspaper coverage and debates about economic ties to the South, slavery and abolition. Within these industrial centers, two other historical forces collided: immigration and industrialization. The newspapers in this collection bring focus on the ensuing labor crisis that led to women's rights and immigration becoming leading topics of debate, offering scholars an on-the-ground view of the complex early history and evolution of civil rights—gender, ethnicity, race, and labor—in America.

Series 19: The Politics of Race in the South

In the American South, the debate over slavery and secession—as recorded and shaped in its regional newspapers—was the result of political, economic, social, and religious forces that continue to be researched and analyzed today.

Series 18: Racial Awakening in the Northeast

New England newspapers played a pivotal role in shaping the national discourse around slavery and civil rights in the decades before and after the American Civil War. Abolitionists, political parties, and religious leaders all used newspapers to sway readers to their causes, making such papers essential material for researchers studying racial and social justice movements.

Specifically designed to work together, these three collections invite researchers working across academic disciplines to discern, interpret, and evaluate the complex evolution of the political, religious, and socio-economic forces that defined the transformation of 19th-century America.
