	What lessons can the FDLP community take from our scholarly communications compatriots' efforts to promote information literacy and information access? Parallels abound, from needing to find a reasonable response when asked to explain copyright and fair use in twenty minutes, to mirrored concerns between today's open publishing environment and the potential privatization of government information. We will consider these challenges in the context of libraries' roles in teaching, research, and publishing, and what individual librarians can do to further this work.
